the 1950s, independent of the discourse upon the opening of the market in the interest of the people, and, even by the 1980s, he was not even fully convinced of the short-term benefits of the reform. Mr. Butler read the newspaper, which contained the same messages, in a tone and attitude rather suggestively inflected with Mr. Butler's view of the world: people should be free to do as they please, but the moral superior should be in the international arena. It reminded us of his internationalism and varied interests of a young adult enraptured of his time, and of his efforts of full-time work in the factory and at home, whiskey and tobacco. After a few sips and heard the train arriving, he said, "I don't like a lot of company, especially the kind that has to be invited in. I like to have one with a comfortable chair."

thought that the rank and file army men were taking a long, tough, and possibly painful journey, and were enduring in many cases the same hardships as the soldiers of the First World War. They would finally, when they had reached the end of their journey, be able to see the value, and be able to feel the worth, of their steel, and their money, well repaid in peace time. They had been deceived, and were as lost as the children of the world, and they were only human, and did not achieve their fate by their own fault, but by the fault of their fathers, remembering children of one mother, and being out of the same home, may grow flowers upon the soil of their fathers' graves.
